

The possibility of low power FM stations being given precedence over existing translators was brought to my attention recently. Personally, I don't understand why an existing translator that is serving a community/region would be allowed to be displaced by a new, unproven station. I am a listener of KLOVE which is at 94.3 MHz in my area. KLOVE serves a vital purpose to our area, and I'm sure all the areas it is broadcast. It provides decent wholesome programming that anyone can listen to, instead of the majority of raunchy or at best iffy radio that is on the rest of the FM spectrum. I feel strongly enough about KLOVE that I support them financially ($100 a month). I don't really know the thought process behind this particular move. If it is to try to bring some more local programming why not do something like disallowing companies like Clear Channel to control huge percentages of what the country listens to.
